You can get updated version here: * * * Demo with XFORCE * Robust Fbx Plugin * Interactive Fbx Plugin Getty Images For more than a decade, the NFL has had to deal with the possibility of a lockout. The owners and the players have several times worked out an agreement to stay within the framework of the current CBA, and they've missed those deadlines, with owners just starting to get the clubhouses ready for the start of the 2014 season and players missing training camp. During that time, the league has been able to move forward with no interruption in play. That won't be the case, however, if there is another work stoppage, which is a real possibility if the two sides can't find a middle ground. Gerald Brown of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch reports that the two sides will meet today for a private meeting to begin discussing the economic issues surrounding a lockout. The owners have already rejected the players' latest proposal, so that leaves the draft as the only significant negotiation remaining. There is a schedule for the meetings. The league usually has three days to approve or disapprove a proposal before it goes to the players union, which would add another day. After that, the union would have three days to vote before the deadline for a lockout. The owners have been coming up with reasons why they should have a lockout. Although they're financially in the black, owners argue that they need to
